Laos, Australia launch inclusive teaching and learning study

The study will look for quality teaching practices that lead to increased student engagement and improved learning outcomes.

Starting in the middle of this month, a team of 23 enumerators from targeted teacher training colleges and of Education and Sports will travel to primary schools in these districts to collect BEQUAL programme, baseline data for the threeyear Inclusive Teaching and Learning Study In February and March each year, they will carry out qualitative case studies through interviews in 21 targeted schools.
In April each year, the team will conduct learning outcome assessments with Grade on schools. Thools.
The study is led by the Teacher Education the Australian gopportfrom and the United States Agency for Intemational Development Director General of the Teacher Education Department, Mr Keth Phanhlack, said the department guided the design of the study and provided guidance to districts and teacher training colleges on school selection, how to support enumerators who are now doing field visits, and how to facilitate discussio on the initial findings. Inclusive education means that all students have access to quality education diverse needs in a responsive, accepting, respectful and supportive environment

Inclusive education takes place in shared educational settings where students of different backgrounds and abilities are supported to overcome barriers that lead to exclusion.
The schools were selected based on the diversity of their student enrolment. Schools that have students with a home language other than Lao, and/or who have students with a disability, and/or have students for whom school attendance is a challenge were prionitised for the study.
With Research the Research Institute for Educational Sciences, some

In a world where education is the key to unlocking potential, the Australian Government together with the Ministry of Education and Sports through #BEQUAL, has launched a three-year inclusive teaching and learning study across 30 target districts.
The study aims to identify effective strategies for promoting inclusive teaching and learning in primary schools of Laos. It seeks to explore and implement strategies that ensure equitable learning opportunities for all students, irrespective of their backgrounds or abilities.
By engaging with 30 districts across the nation, the initiative aims to enhance student engagement and learning outcomes through tailored, inclusive practices. This effort represents a significant stride towards realising an educational environment that celebrates diversity and inclusivity.
