Australian Ambassador to Laos, Megan Jones, last week visits a primary school in Xieng Khuang province.

Australia reaffirms support for quality education for Lao children

Times Reporters

The Australian government has reaffirmed its commitment to provide quality primary education for all children in Laos, with senior Embassy officials observing classes using the revised primary school curriculum.

Minister for Education and Sports, Associate Prof. Dr Phout Simmalavong, and Australia's Ambassador to Laos, Megan Jones, on March 22 visited a primary school in Kham district, Xieng Khuang province, to observe the revised national primary curriculum being taught.

Ambassador Jones also hosted an information session about the Australian government's tertiary scholarships programme – the Australia Awards scholarships – for potential Lao applicants.

During the school visit, Dr Phout said "The Lao government recognises that quality basic education is the foundation of a prosperous and peaceful nation. With the support of Australia, Laos revised the national primary curriculum to integrate a new teaching approach in which student engagement and learning is facilitated through activities, hands-on experience, and practical application."

Ambassador Jones said "Australia has a long-term partnership with the Lao government in education. Our goal, working with the Ministry of Education and Sports, is that primary school-aged children in Laos, particularly those experiencing disadvantage, increase their engagement in learning and improve their learning outcomes."

"We are very honoured that the Lao government entrusted Australia through the BEQUAL programme to improve primary education and revise the national primary curriculum," she said.

Dr Phout and Ambassador Jones observed Lao Language, Science and Environment and English classes being taught using the revised curriculum and the teaching and learning materials developed with Australian support.

They were pleased to see students collaborating, engaging with the materials, learning through experimentation, and reflecting on what they were doing.

They congratulated the school principal and teachers and recognised the key role played by teachers in bringing the revised curriculum to life.

Ambassador Jones said the Ministry of Education and Sports, with Australian support, has significantly transformed primary education through the new national primary curriculum.

The Australian government will continue its collaboration with the Ministry of Education and Sports through the BEQUAL programme with a stronger focus on teacher professional development.

BEQUAL is a programme led by the Lao government with support from the Australian government and the United States Agency for International Development (USAID).

"The Lao government recognises that quality basic education is the foundation of a prosperous and peaceful nation. With the support of Australia, we revised the national primary curriculum to integrate a new teaching approach in which student engagement and learning is facilitated through activities, hands-on experience, and practical application. I am delighted to be here today with Ambassador Jones to observe the new way of teaching and learning that is guiding the development of Lao's future generation," Minister Phout said during the school visit.

"Australia has a long-term partnership with the Lao government in education. Our goal, working with the Ministry of Education and Sports, is that primary school-aged children in Laos, particularly those experiencing disadvantage, increase their engagement in learning and improve their learning outcomes. We are very honored that the Lao government entrusted Australia through the BEQUAL program to improve primary education and revise the national primary curriculum. It is a huge endeavour and I am pleased to be here today in this lovely primary school with Minister Phout to witness the results of our joint efforts," said Ambassador Jones.

Minister Phout and Ambassador Jones observed Lao Language, Science and Environment and English classes being taught using the revised curriculum and the teaching and learning materials developed with Australian support. They were pleased to see students collaborating, engaging with the materials, learning through experimentation and reflecting on what they were doing. They congratulated the school Principal and teachers and recognized the key role of teachers to bring the revised curriculum to life.

"The Ministry of Education and Sports, with Australian support, has significantly transformed primary education through the new national primary curriculum. This pivotal change introduces a student-centered, active learning approach, moving away from rote learning to equip students with essential 21st century skills. We recognise that teachers will require ongoing support to fully adopt the new teaching and learning practices. The Australian Government will continue its collaboration with the Ministry of Education and Sports through the BEQUAL program with a stronger focus on teacher professional development," Ambassador Jones added.

Australia reaffirms support for quality education for Lao children

The Australian government has reaffirmed its commitment to provide quality primary education for all children in Laos, with senior Embassy officials observing classes using the revised primary school curriculum.
Minister for Education and Sports, Associate Prof. Dr Phout Simmalavong, and Australia's Ambassador to Laos, Megan Jones, on March 22 visited a primary school in Kham district, Xieng Khuang province, to observe the revised national primary curriculum being taught.

Australian Ambassador to Laos, Megan Jones, last week visits a primary school in Xieng Khuang province.

Ambassador Jones also hosted an information session about the Australian government's tertiary scholarships programme – the Australia Awards scholarships – for potential Lao applicants.
During the school visit, Dr Phout said "The Lao government recognises that quality basic education is the foundation of a prosperous and peaceful nation. With the support of Australia, Laos revised the national primary curriculum to integrate a new teaching approach in which student engagement and learning is facilitated through activities, hands-on experience, and practical application."
Ambassador Jones said "Australia has a long-term partnership with the Lao government in education. Our goal, working with the Ministry of Education and Sports, is that primary school-aged children in Laos, particularly those experiencing disadvantage, increase their engagement in learning and improve their learning outcomes."
"We are very honoured that the Lao government entrusted Australia through the BEQUAL programme to improve primary education and revise the national primary curriculum," she said.
Dr Phout and Ambassador Jones observed Lao Language, Science and Environment and English classes being taught using the revised curriculum and the teaching and learning materials developed with Australian support.
They were pleased to see students collaborating, engaging with the materials, learning through experimentation, and reflecting on what they were doing.
They congratulated the school principal and teachers and recognised the key role played by teachers in bringing the revised curriculum to life.
Ambassador Jones said the Ministry of Education and Sports, with Australian support, has significantly transformed primary education through the new national primary curriculum.
The Australian government will continue its collaboration with the Ministry of Education and Sports through the BEQUAL programme with a stronger focus on teacher professional development.
BEQUAL is a programme led by the Lao government with support from the Australian government and the United States Agency for International Development (USAID).
